icha and has great graphics so it looked like a monster! It was a great game as always and showed how much of an engine company like id could truly pull off! Eidos has done such a good job of such a short amount of time they've been given to port over their games. As I said, Inferno is a great game, and it shows how powerful the Unreal Engine 3 can be. Their first AAA port though? THAT is a challenge. I'd love to see them tackle Halo 2 sometime, but Unreal Tournament 3 is what they've done. i agree with you, what is sad is how much attention is being paid to companies that aren't known at all. i mean halo is THE popular game but this is what people really make a fuss about these days...even though id's recent releases have been amazing games, this was a great port (i'm not mad at it at all) well, their major release is coming out on this system, so it should be interesting to see how they do...halo is much more popular, but only certain types of people buy it, not the type that buys games that aren't halo... Halo and Unreal Tournament 3 are both popular. I'm sure that Halo has some people who play Unreal Tournament 3. No it's not the same as Halo, and no it's not a port of the same game. It's a port of Unreal Tournament 3. Halo 2 and Unreal Tournament 3 are different games. And for the most part, they have different target markets. Hydrothermal processing of a biowaste-based bottom ash to produce biochar as a soil amendment. To reduce and solve the issues of topsoil depletion and land desertification caused by the excessive use of synthetic fertilizers, it is necessary to find an alternative or supplementary soil amendment material to replace the synthetic fertilizer. A bench-scale hydrothermal process was proposed to hydrolyze the bottom ash, a solid waste, to prepare biochar as the soil amendment. The material characterization of the biochar was analyzed through Fourier transform infrared spectroscopy, X-ray diffraction, Brunauer-Emmett-Teller analysis, and N<sub>2</sub> adsorption-desorption analysis. The effects of hydrothermal process parameters, including temperature, time, and initial acid concentration on the material characteristics were 82157476af
